Outline

In early times, same-sex marriage was not considered viable and in many cultures, it was discouraged. Plutarch explains that in the early civilizations of Mesopotamia and ancient Egypt, the union between couples of the same sex was recognized by the Egyptians. During Greek's early years, attraction between a man and another man was normal and was considered an expression of love. "The main considerations in same-sex relationships in early history were often love, beauty, and excellence of character rather than gender" (BBC). (1) Same-sex marriages were often believed to be more pure than a heterosexual marriage. Marriage was believed to be the union of two people based on love. A marriage consisting of two males or two females, if women had the right to get married, it was not frowned upon. Although gay marriage gains against many religious beliefs, the U.S. government should legalize it in all states because having same-sex marriage promotes family stability, equality in actions, and provides economic business opportunities.
