Abstract

The aim of this article is to synthesise the various views of gender inequality and various indicators used to measure it. It argues that women lag behind men in most indicators of socio-economic development and they constitute the majority of the poor, the unemployed and the socially disadvantaged. Productive differences as measured by the traditional method as well as the institutions and markets advancement are not sufficient to explain gender inequality. The political economy view of power and self-interest embedded in the household, community and government play relevant role in defining gender gaps. Growth models that are institutionally blind completely leaves out the impact that social institutions such as family, school, unions, government have in shaping inequalities. The collective self-interest and power within institutions motivate men and women to allocate the resource under their control to activities that best enable them to fulfill their obligations rather than to activities that are common.

Background

Inequality is a phenomenon that many people have strong views. It is probably a key factor in producing or exacerbating a wide range of social ills such as educational disadvantage, health inequalities, intergenerational immobility, and crime, and may undermine social cohesion. It relates with economic performance but in a much more complex fashion than a simple trade-off between growth and inequality. (Niles, 2001). Persistent inequality constrains a society's productivity and ultimately slows its rate of economic growth and the economy pays for this in reduced productivity today and diminished national output tomorrow. (Awoyemi, 2004). Since the early 1980s, rising inequality in earnings and household income has been a focal policy issue (Oshiki, 2006; Bluestone and Harrison, 1982; Dudley and Gottschalk, 1982, 1984; Heston and Ryznarow, 1980). In Nigeria, the inequality level is said to have worsened and many studies using household survey income and consumption concept document this fact. For example Aghobian (2008) showed increasing levels of inequality, poverty and polarization using nationwide surveys for 1955/6, 1962/3 and 1966/7. A much earlier study by Cansarajah, et
