Copyright Protection of Intellectual Property in the Digital Age

Intellectual property rights can be divided into 5 categories:

1. Patents- the temporary right to exclude use of a novel invention
2. Copyright- Temporary right of an author or artist to keep others from using his work
3. Trade Secrets- The protection (often implicit) of commercial information which companies have attempted to keep secret.
4. Trademarks- Identification of a word or mark that identifies the source of a product or service
5. Mask works- the protection of designs and layouts of semi-conductors.

More broadly, "invention and creative expression plus protection equals 'intellectual property'" (Sherwood 1990, p 7).

The changes to intellectual property are wide ranging. Watal (1990) describes the efforts of a number of government backed institutions in India which are attempting to document all traditional knowledge concerning the therapeutic properties of plants and their derivatives in an effort to protect this knowledge from corporate patenting, for the benefit of the population. The use of URLs as quasi-trademarks is common knowledge. Arguably the most problematic of the above categories, however, is copyright.

Although computers straddle the world between the technological and the informational and aesthetic, the adaptations required of industrial property are not so striking as those demanded of a service which has as its prototype the expression of literary and artistic individuality. (Cornish 1999, p 532)

In identifying some of the problems associated with copyright in the digital age, and broadly interpreting the intent of current and prospective legislation, it is hoped that the need for international harmonisation can be justified
